Belyaeva E.I. Main groups of lexical units, formed as a result of appealing and onomization processes

The article deals with the scientific project devoted to the description of the formal types of words and phrases created due to the interaction of proper and common nouns in the framework of the English language. These main groups of lexical units are given and described as different kinds of proper names. Various types of lexical units such as simple units, units with affixes and compound words, phrase structures with two, three and four words are described. The process of forming proper nouns from common ones and the opposite process are regarded as an efficient means of enriching the English word stock; the mechanisms of this process can be used in order to name objects in different spheres of life. Due to the analysis of the data taken from linguistic-cultural dictionaries the main types of lexical units have been named.

Key words: proper and common nouns, onomastics.
