Vorozhko Yu.N. Significance of philosophic-and-anthropological approach in the research of the problem of personality self-realization

Philosophical-anthropological approach makes it possible to identify the underlying basis of procedural nature of the self-activity and clarify the characteristics of illogical, impractical, superadaptive, passionate behavior. Procedural and structural philosophical-anthropological approach involves the consideration of the issues on the installation of multivariate nature of its explication, involving an appeal to the adjacent spaces of contextual self-realization and identification of various facets, which highlighted this phenomenon in question. In this regard, consideration will be the most valuable for self-identity in the light of such key philosophical and anthropological categories such as freedom, creativity, love, happiness, the meaning of life.

Key words: philosophical-anthropological approach, self-realization, everyday life, freedom, creativity, love, happiness, meaning of life.
