Social and psychological peculiarities of international communication and the problem of interethnic marriages in North Caucasus

In international communication there are considerable difficulties both objective and subjective. We deal with the differences in mentality, in the system of cultural values, attitudes and ethnic stereotypes, language, everyday traditions, character, their historical relationship. Everyday direct communication of nationalities within a certain historical time and based on the principles of international peace and equality affect the mass processes that contribute to the formation, the birth of a unique phenomenon in the life of nationalities – interethnic marriage. It is concluded that in Dagestan the most stable, solid and justified family is mononational family, monosocial, monoconfessional that is based on the unity of one nation, one social and religious orientations. In the new realities of post-Soviet development, it makes sense to explore the problems of interethnic dialogue through subordination, specificity, history, regional specificity etc.

Key words: communication, international communication, inter-ethnic marriage.
