

SOCIAL STUDY

M.V. Shedi

(Russian academy of economics and state service. Orel, Russia)

Anti-corruption coalition of civil society as a way to partner interaction of society and the state in the field of anti-corruption

Corruption, as a systemic problem requires a systemic effort to resolve it, lies in concerted action by all sectors of society, all its three sectors: government, business and civil society. These coordinated actions should be aimed primarily at addressing the causes and conditions for corruption. It is civil society and its institutions should be generator anti-corruption policy and to direct state authorities to implement it. However, multidirectional, not enough coordinated actions of individual segments of civil society do not allow to talk today about the high efficiency of the fight against corruption civil society in Russia. This is largely associated with the institutional biases in the interaction of power and society. The article emphasizes that the key to combating corruption is to unite the efforts of all interested individuals and organizations and the formation of anti-corruption coalitions of civil society organizations and partnerships with the authorities. According to the author, for civil society organizations, it is important to unite in some cohesive structure, the coalition that are able to precisely and consistently engaged in anti-corruption activities.

Key words: corruption, civil society, anti-corruption, anti-corruption coalition of Russian society.

June, 17, 2014
