

HISTORY

E.K. Sklyarova

(Rostov state medical university. Rostov-on-Don, Russia)

Public health and the problem of corruption in Great Britain and Ireland during the period of urbanization

The article attempts to analyze the rise of the social policy in Great Britain in the context of the public health and the problem of corruption. The Government of Great Britain tried to solve these and many others social problems in Ireland and Great Britain during the period of urbanization. In the course of different reforms parliament began to form the social policy. During the period of urbanization public healthcare and the problem of corruption were the central issue of consideration of reformatories, parliament and media. The principles of social policy in Britain during the urbanization were: utilitarianism, centralization of management, population mortality prevention and the rise of social problems, state control through inspection and reports, workers' salary, corruption prevention, welfare provision of all layers of population of Great Britain, including Ireland.

Key words: public health, corruption, Great Britain, Ireland, E. Chadwick, J. Bentham, social policy, urbanization.

February, 17, 2016
