Cynicism and skepticism in culture and intercultural communication

Philosophical skepticism and cynicism in culture and intercultural communication are interesting as there are intriguing arguments, despite their initial implausibility. Many modern epistemological propositions can be fruitfully presented in response to some aspects of the arguments about intercultural communication. The traditional question of the structure of knowledge and justification, generating fundamentalism, coherence, and infinitism, can be considered as the result of one of the main arguments in favor of such communication. In our article, we present skepticism, cynicism and evaluate their main arguments in intercultural communication.

Key words: intercultural communication, cynicism, skepticism, culture.
