Autonomy and heteronomy in modern sociality

The relationship between autonomy (human) and heteronomy (systemic-social) in the structure of sociality is considered. The authors distinguish organic sociality, which is based on human autonomy and characterize organic sociality. The authors refer to the characteristic features of organic sociality, first of all, its substantive-activity character, since it comes from a person, from individuals. In addition, organic sociality is characterized as a healthy sociality, in which social and human are balanced, which makes it possible to resist the social system and pathologies of sociality. The importance of preserving the life world of people from state interference, observance of human rights and freedoms is emphasized. It is concluded that modern Russian sociality is strongly influenced by the traditions of heteronomy.

Key words: autonomy, heteronomy, organic sociality, man, personality, society.
