Higher education in the social system: foundations and prospects for development

The article argues that education is primarily a social phenomenon, which is a purposeful process of upbringing and learning. A significant problem of the modern stage of higher education is the problem of socialization of the modern generation. One of the elements of the process of adapting a person to the world around him is relatively controlled socialization in the course of the systematic formation by society of conditions for teaching and educating a person, as well as his conscious self-change. It is shown that, like any other system, higher education faces its own problems, which can have a negative impact on the quality of education and on the formation of personality.

Key words: learning, nurturing, research, personality, motivation, communication, adaptation.
